Overview:

"Years ago when Rufio popped up on my radar, I was endlessly spinning records like New Found Glory's self titled and Midtown's Save the World, Lose the Girl. (Rufio) proved a welcomed addition to my collection as some of the fastest, most technical, and melodic pop-punk I had ever heard. Despite the ultra quick pace and rapid fire guitar work, I was impressed that they could still translate emotion. No matter how immature or youthful, the music still communicated feeling. Almost 5 years later, most of the bands I used to cherish have now changed, some more drastically than others, and justifiably so. Generally speaking, today's scene is on the lookout for a darker, more aggressive, and far more profound breed of sounds. Essentially any of the albums that were once my favorites, released currently, would probably be slandered, even by myself, and swallowed into nothingness. However, Rufio have bore the waves of time like only a handful of others have been able to. With deeply planted roots and a firm musical structure, the tides of change have washed over them, but never knocked them down."
